PRO FOOTBALL'S IVY LEAGUE GAME

Giants and Redskins Meet for 26th Time

The frenzied rivalry between the Giants and Redskins has aptly been called professional football's Ivy League game. The basis for this appellation is the fury with which these teams have ripped at each other's throat ever since 1937, when George Preston Marshall transferred his National Football League franchise from Boston, where his promotorial talents were not appreciated, to Washington, where they have been an outstanding success.

Talk about Yale-Harvard, Pennsylvania-Cornell and Army-Navy. Why these are just love feasts compared to the donnybrooks the Giants and Redskins have staged, here and in the Capitol City's Griffith Stadium, over the past thirteen years.

Most of the time it has meant something important when the Giants and the Redskins came to grips on the gridiron. Except for the last two years, when the Philadelphia Eagles have been flying so high, New York and Washington have been the dominant powers in the NFL's Eastern Division.

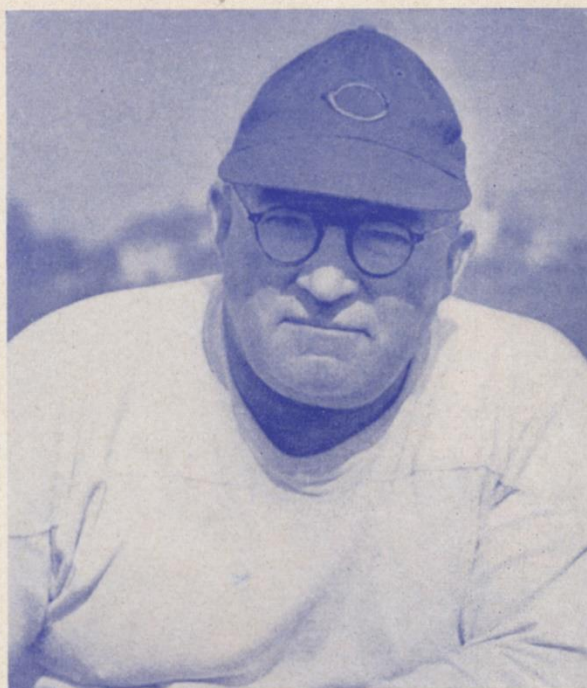

For ten straight seasons, from 1937 to 1946, the Giants or the Redskins, one or the other, won the divisional title. As a general rule, Washington was second when New York won the crown, and vice-versa. Once, in 1943, they came down to wire in a deadlock and had to play-off for the prize.

Steve Owen's Giants finished on top in 1938, 1939, 1941, 1944 and 1946. The Redskins, under Ray Flaherty, caught the brass ring in 1937, 1940 and 1942; scored in 1943, under Dutch Bergman, and made good again in 1945, under Dud DeGroot.

Five divisional titles apiece is the bag of the Giants and the Redskins over the space of their blazing rivalry. The Men of Mara went on to take the league championship, the third in the club's history, in 1938. The Men of Marshall "took it all" in 1938 and 1942.

Examination of the series record show how closely matched these teams have been over the years. Going into this afternoon's contest, the Giants have won fourteen games, the Redskins have won eleven games and one tie has been played. In their twenty-six previous meetings, New York has scored 440 points and Washington has scored 413 points.

What the records don't show is that, as often as not, the team that figured to win was beaten. It's that kind of a dogfight when the Giants and the Redskins get together. You can throw form out the window and make money playing the underdog.

As a side issue to the team rivalry, there is a personal duel on tap today. Directing Washington's T and throwing the ball with that famous buggy-whip arm of his is Samuel Adrian Baugh. Performing the same functions for the Giants is a young fellow named Charley Conerly.

These two guys, quite alike in appearance, discounting a slight difference of eleven years in age, happen at the moment to stand one-two among the National League passers. And it is the young Giant, rather than the old warrior, who is the No. 1 boy.

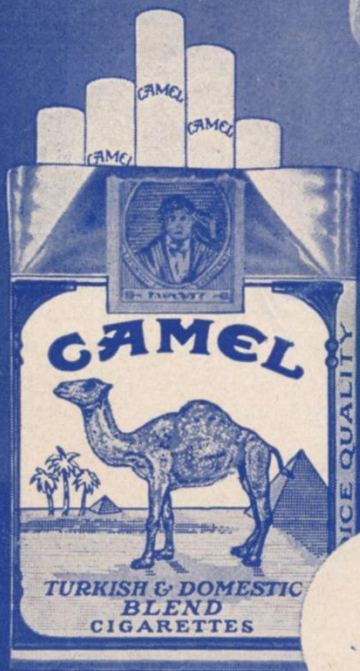

That is a state of affairs that does not sit well with Slingshot Sammy, who owes much of his immortality to the reputation he built in playing in every one of the Giant-Redskin battles.

As if there were need to pile more fuel on a fire that always has burned with a fierce heat, you have Conerly against Baugh. Could there be anything better?

A BUMPER CROP OF ROOKIES

Giant Freshmen Show Rare Promise

Every so often, someone watching the Giants play football will pipe up, "Whatever became of Dick Duden?" Or they'll ask about Frank Lo Vuolo or some other rookie who came off the college campus with a glowing reputation.

Well, Duden and most of the other freshmen are being more or less hidden by the usual hot-house treatment favored by Steve Owen and other top-ranking professional coaches. In bringing the green-horns along slowly, they seldom are allowed to play on offense, the most eye-catching phase of the game.

Sweating it out on defense, however, this year's Giant rookie crop has contributed almost as much as the veterans to success of the Giants' Silver Jubilee Year.

Notable among the frosh has been Bob Greenhalgh, who has proved the inevitable exception to the slow-seasoning rule. This 200-pound bull from San Francisco battered his way into the first-string offensive fullback spot in training camp and has gotten better with each start. Word has gotten around that this savage line smasher and blocker is the fullback find of the year. It's a report that doesn't seem exaggerated in the least.

It has been rather difficult, also, to hide Jack Salscheider and Cletus Fischer, the two other new backs.

Salscheider is 'way out in front in league statistics as kick-off return leader. It was his 96-yard kick-off return with the second-half boot which sparked the Maramen to victory over the Cardinals. Playing for little St. Thomas out in Minnesota last year, Jack carried for almost 1000 yards and an average of 10 yards a crack.

Fischer recently earned a regular defensive berth.

He hits with much more fury and authority than usual for a 170 pounder. They say around the locker room he'd kill somebody if he were 195. He's a nifty spot runner, too, as he showed against Green Bay during the exhibition season and against Washington last month.

Getting back to Duden, the former Navy officer was known as an outstanding pass catcher while playing with Annapolis. So far this year, however, he and the other rookie ends have seen very little aside from defensive play.

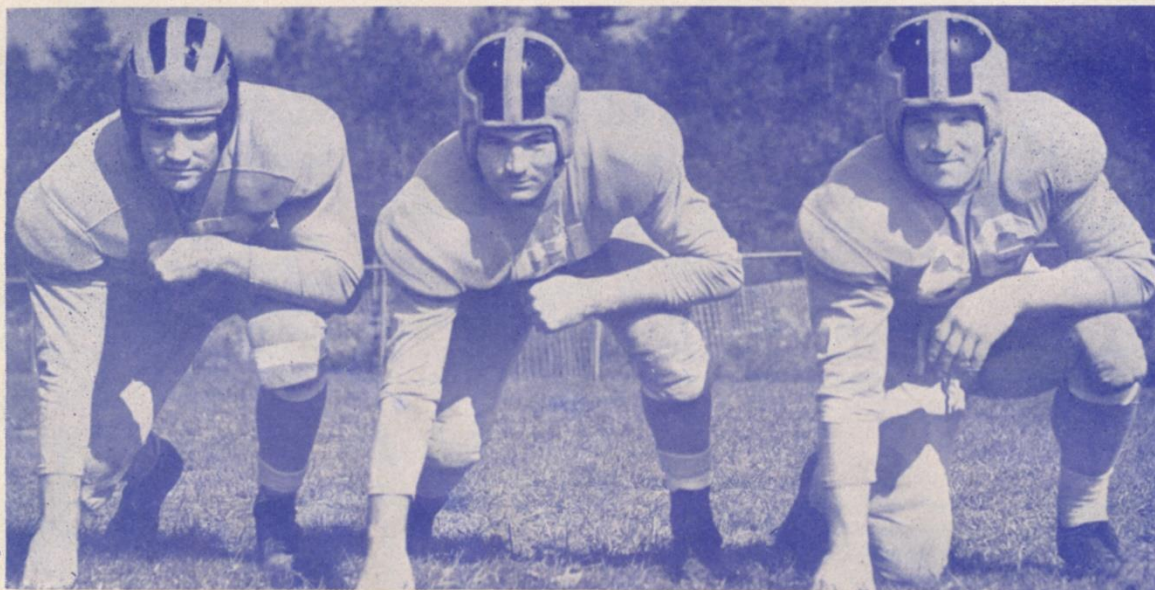

Virtually all the offensive flank maneuvering has been left to the veteran Bill Swiacki and Ray Poole. But the tackling and boxing-in work of Duden, Lo Vuolo, George Kershaw and Dick Hensley have been first class throughout.

Lo Vuolo is a 210-pounder from St. Bonaventure who showed up so admirably in the camp of the Eastern All Stars this year. Kershaw is from Colgate and Hensley from Kentucky.

Five of the eleven guards and tackles on the Giant roster are in their first year as pros. They are Bill Austin, Al DeRogatis, Carl Butkus, Ralph Hutchinson and Jon Baker.

So hail to the Giant Rookies of 1949! Most of them are hiding under a bushel basket this year. But watch 'em next fall. There'll be no holding 'em!

HIGH SCORING GIANT

NFL Touchdown Record in Reach of Roberts

The Giants' remaining games—today with the Redskins and the next two with the Eagles—will give Gene (Choo Choo) Roberts a chance to break the league touchdown record. . . . So far the Chattanooga Special has 15 touches. . . . Only two others have surpassed that total. Steve Van Buren made 18 in 1945 and Don Hutson 17 in '42.

Roberts, one of the sensations of the year, is looking forward to his direct duel with Van Buren. . . . Steve will be ready for the challenge. . . . In helping Philadelphia to a 42-0 romp over the Bulldogs last week, Bayou Boy scored two touchdowns and gained 174 yards on 35 carries from scrimmage.

Giant followers naturally are rooting for a Steeler victory over the Eagles in Philadelphia today. . . . If that happens, Greasy Neale's boys will have two defeats, giving New York a chance to tie the leaders in their meetings the next two weeks. . . . Coming into today's game with the 'Skins, Steve Owen's men show four defeats.

Following last week's Detroit game, Chuck Conerly still holds the league passing lead he took over in the Green Bay tussle. . . . Bo McMillin touts the Giants as the coming young team of the future. . . . With three games left, the Maramen have already won more games than they did in 1947 and '48.

MEET THE REDSKINS

Sammy Baugh and Dan Sandifer talk things over on the Redskin bench as they wait the call to return to action.

Coaching Staff

Now in charge of the Redskins is Herman Ball. An assistant and scout for Washington for several seasons under a succession of head coaches, Ball took over the post of commander-in-chief three weeks ago when Admiral John E. (Billick) Whelchel threw in the towel. Wilbur Moore, a Redskin star of the not-so-distant past, and Al Heagy serve as Ball's assistants. Glenn (Turk) Edwards, head coach emeritus and one of pro football's all-time great tackles, still figures in the picture as chief scout and advance drum-beater.

Style of Play

The Redskins switched from their traditional single-wing to T a few years back and now are well versed in football's favorite formation. With all their prowess as a passing team, they do not neglect running and have shown the ability to move the ball well both by ground and by air. When they do go upstairs, the Redskins often deploy in a T-version of the double wing, with their halfbacks stationed wide on the flanks and their ends split wide also. This puts their pass receivers in a position to get clear in a hurry. A weak defensive line has hurt the Redskins this year but their secondaries are real ball-hawks who make it tough on opposing passers.

Prominent Backs

Sammy Baugh (33), sprightly 36-year-old veteran of thirteen NFL campaigns, is still the No. 1 offensive threat of the Redskins. Slingshotting Sammy, a supreme aerial artist, holds just about every important passing record in the NFL. He throws them long, short and in all directions and seldom gets trapped with the ball. . . . Harry Gilmer (52), who wound up a glowing college career at Alabama in 1947, came into the picture as Baugh's understudy this season after sitting out the 1948 with injuries. A running, as well as a passing threat, he is beginning to make his presence felt. . . . Bob Goode (21), rookie halfback from Texas A. and M., leads the 'Skins in rushing. . . . Pete Stout (32) and Harry Dowda (22), also first-year men, have been doing a good job of carrying the ball also. . . . All three of these freshmen have speed as well as power. . . . Dan Sandifer (20) and Howie Livingston (24), an ex-Giant, are far-ranging defensive secondaries who make a specialty of intercepting passes. . . . Dick Poillon (25), who hails from Valley Stream, L. I., is a jack-of-all-trades who is one of the NFL's best punters and place-kickers.

Outstanding Linemen

Hugh Taylor (28) and Hal Crisler (55), swift and tall, are the favorite passing targets of Baugh and Gilmer and are as good a tandem as will be found in the NFL. . . . Lauri Niemi (47), 236-pound "sophomore" from Washington State, has developed into one of the league's most fearsome tackles and John (Tree) Adams (42), an ex-Notre Damer who towers 6 feet 7 is a rough customer also. . . . John Steber (46) and Mike Katrishen (58) are a rock-and-sock pair of guards and the veteran John Badaczewski (57) is a defensive mainstay in the middle. . . . Al Demao (53) has rated among the best NFL centers for five years. He is a far-ranging backer-up, a decisive tackler and a great ball-hawk.

Got a minute Have a Hires

An All-American time out treat. Like football's greats Hires has plus quality—standout deliciousness that comes from real root juices . . . more enjoyable than the artificial flavors generally used in other root beers.

That's why Hires, with velvet-edge flavor, is the largest selling root beer and has led its league for over 79 years.

It makes the game
more enjoyable

Pass Defense

By EMLEN TUNNELL

A good knowledge of your opponents' strength and weakness, plus constant alertness and the ability to move quickly, are the fundamental factors in a good pass defense.

Defensive backs always must know the exact down that is being played and the distance the opposing team has to go for a first down. This enables them to anticipate the play that the opposing quarterback is likely to call.

However, while such anticipation is proper, it is important that a defensive back does not blindly commit himself on a guess. In this league, quarterbacks will let you get away with that no more than once.

So, having prepared himself mentally for what may happen, the defensive back takes his position and, as the play starts, keeps a sharp eye on the offensive end.

If the opposing wingman on his side blocks, and sticks with the block, the chances are in favor of a running play to that side. If the end breaks out to come downfield, a pass is indicated.

Sensing a pass, the defender should have his feet well apart and be on his toes, ready to go either way and to react quickly, with coordination, to any fake or feint by the potential receiver.

It is important to avoid crossing the legs in covering a receiver and, while moving with him, a defender also should try to keep the passer within his field of vision.

Another point—play the receiver so as to keep him within the smallest possible receiving zone and try to make him commit himself as to direction.

In addition to perfecting the mechanical phases of his job, the pass defender must also have a good idea of the relative speeds of the receivers he is covering. Some receivers can be played more closely than others without committing the cardinal sin of pass defense—permitting your man to get behind you for that big catch.

Receivers cannot hurt you too much catching a pass or two in front of you but they can beat you if they get behind you. I try to play receivers like a baseball outfielder plays hitters, in accordance with their strength and weaknesses.

Once a pass is thrown and the ball is in the air, the defender must get to it whether he is playing a man-to-man defense or zone. One basic instinct the good pass defender must possess is that he is as much entitled to the ball as the intended receiver. He should make a strong effort to catch the ball and not be satisfied just to knock it down.

Getting to the ball is the important thing. If you can catch, you can go. If your opponent catches it, you can tackle him. And if your teammate catches it, you can block for him.

So get to the ball at all costs and be in the action!
